In ancient times, the good government of a country depended almost entirely on what sort of man was the king. If he was a man who wanted to see his people happy and prosperous, he could do a great deal for them by stopping quarrels and settling disputes justly, by making good roads, by building hospitals and schools. If, on the other hand, he was a selfish, cruel and greedy man, he could do a lot of harm by taking people's goods, by making harsh laws and appointing bad officers and denying justice to people. But the people would usually put up with a bad king provided he did not interfere with their ordinary ways of earning their livelihood. It was only when the king was very bad, cruel, unjust and oppressive that the people tried to get rid of him.

10. Make notes, in outline form, on the main ideas of the passage given below : 5

Education is not an end but a means to an end. In other words, we do not educate children only for the purpose of educating them; our purpose is to fit them for life. As soon as we realize this fact, we will understand that it is very important to choose a system of education which will really prepare children for life. It is not enough to choose the first system we find; or to continue with one's old system of education without examining it to see whether it is, infact, suitable or not.

In many modern countries, it has been fashionable to think that by free education for all—whether rich or poor, clever or dull—one can solve all the problems of the society and build a perfect nation. But we can easily see that free education for all is not enough : we find in such countries a far larger number of people with university degrees than there are jobs for them to do. Because of their degrees, they refuse to do what they think to be low work.

But we have to understand that the work of a completely uneducated farmer is far more important than that of a professor : we can live without education, but we die without food. In our towns, if no one cleans our streets and takes away the rubbish from our house, we will suffer from terrible diseases. In countries where there is no one to do such work, professors and others would have to do it besides doing their own work, and it would be such a waste of time for them.
